Just asks do people ever wonder what have their kids been up to at school. Lewis says he fills the gap between what parents have as a record of their children. He was inspired after finding long forgotten Super 8 footage of his father. He went to his local school to work out a way a classroom might be opened up to a film crew to record the children for a week. Just asks if there are legal issues. Lewis says it is a school program so consent is needed and included in the starter pack. He says feedback from teachers shows children love being filmed and it teaches them about multi-media. They have worked with remote communities with the aim of working out data about indigenous schools.
